Manager's Commentary

The tail continues to wag the dog. In a market where foreign investors contribute on average 10 to 15% of daily turnover, and where domestic institutional players are essentially a handful of prop books and a few small funds the conclusion must be that this is a retail-dominated stock exchange. These investors either do not believe that the government has the will (or ability) to raise foreign ownership limits or do not care because such a move is too remote given their investment time horizon. The only so-called "blue chips" that are of interest to the retail pack are those included in the ETFs because those are the only ones that foreigners can currently easily trade and be positioned against. Brokers here in general merely report retail sentiment rather than attempt to either educate or influence it and that results in a situation where seemingly no-one (except us) believes that change is coming. If and when it does come it is reasonable to expect an exaggerated move. Until then, nothing much.
